Seeing SCOPE Miami attendees Victori Contemporary and Aureus was a major treat, along with viewing contemporary art that ranges from I Santissimi's perplexing fabrication of a sectioned, crouching human, shown by Gagliardi Art System, to Ran Hwang's webbed chandelier of thousands of crystals and beads pinned to plexiglass. Hwang is represented by Inception Gallery in Paris.

Comenius Rothlisberger and Admir Jahic, The Invisible Heroes, standing with one of several works shown for the fair

Comenius Rothlisberger and Admir Jahic, the artists better known as The Invisible Heroes, have works on display specifically for SCOPE. In their stand-alone space, this cool duo presents resin sculptural objects embedded with colored pigments, allowing reflections from fluorescent lighting to skate along their surfaces.

However, the fair's biggest crowd pleaser was a series of small clear cases that carry a big message. Created by Yves Hayat, these shriveling images of coveted icons and designer brands ask their admirers to consider the price paid for celebrity, consumerism, and wealth. Not to worry, in addition to showing in Paris, Hayat's dealer, Mark Hachem, also occupies a space in New York's Chelsea. But if you've taken a vow only to see art in Miami, preferring a little more pizzazz with your viewing pleasure, I'm sure he could be convinced to fly south for the winter...just in time for our spiced up version of this beloved event.

This is so inspiring - I'm astounded and impressed: Thank you for continuing this incredibly important work. Miami both needs, and is ready to blossom, as an art inspired city. Thank you. Thank you. Thank you. Peace.
